WASHINGTON.

Important Speech of President Johnson.

His Policy Towards the Rebels Foreworded.

Treason is a Crime and Traitors Shall Suffer in Penalty.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1865.
The President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, delivered a most important and stirring address to the Senate in the Senate chamber, which was held at ten o'clock this evening. The President was dressed in a simple black frock coat, and his manner was most impressive. He spoke in a clear, firm, and powerful voice, and his words were heard with great attention by the Senators and the few members of the public who were present.

The President's address was a most important one, and it dealt with the most important question of the day—the reconstruction of the South. He declared that the rebels were traitors, and that they must be punished for their crimes. He said that the South must be brought back into the Union, but that this could only be done if the rebels were first punished. He said that the South must be allowed to elect their own representatives, but that these representatives must be sworn to support the Constitution and the laws of the United States. He said that the South must be allowed to elect their own representatives, but that these representatives must be sworn to support the Constitution and the laws of the United States.
